

Historic Haslemere

Haslemere is a town with old foundations and has a fascinating history which invites you to delve into its past.

In 1393 it was given an annual fair by Royal Charter, as well as a weekly market. Queen Elizabeth I laid the true foundations of the town by granting the right to elect two members of Parliament. In 1596, a new charter was granted confirming the weekly market and permitting two annual fairs. Today, this special status is celebrated with the Charter Fair, held in the High Street every other year.

The oldest part of the town centres on the High Street, where there are several buildings dating back to the 14th & 15th centuries. These include Half Moon House, one of the town's oldest buildings, the Town Hall built in 1814 which originally had open arches on the ground floor for market stallholders, Tudor Cottage next to the Georgian Hotel and the three-gabled Lloyds Pharmacy building.

The opening of the London to Portsmouth railway in 1859 was an important landmark in the history of Haslemere as it enabled many people to come and enjoy the lovely countryside and healthy air. A number of well-known people settled in the area including Alfred Lord Tennyson, Poet Laureate to Queen Victoria, George Bernard Shaw who wrote Caesar and Cleopatra whilst living locally and Sir Arthur Conan Doyle who wrote some of his Sherlock Holmes stories here.

Many fine houses were built during the late 19th and early 20th century and because of easy access to London by rail, the town became a fashionable place to live and continues to be a popular commuter town today.
